If you go out at night and look up you'll see stars behind stars and behind suns the smallest, faintest stars, more night. The stars are suns like our sun and all of them you can see from the closest to the farthest are a few, no more of all the stars there are. And all the black you see between them is a very thin slice of all the black there is. The planet you're standing on looking out at the stars is the earth, the third planet from the sun, and the mildest and the softest of the nine. It takes a year to go once around the sun and a day to spin once on its axis the way a top spins.

In all the black you see the only people we know whose voices we can hear, the only animals we've seen, the only trees, the only insects, the only fish we've ever seen are here, hanging in nothing the way a bubble hangs in air. Solid and rocky and heavy we think it is, when actually it's as pale and delicate and lovely as a bubble. It floats in nothing with all of us on it, shining like a bubble. Be able to look out your window in the rain and see everything.

Not just the rain, or the street, or the reflections in the window, but everything at once. See that the buildings are little blocks and the grass and whatever trees there are just perch on a little bit of the very top of the ground so that if you could unwind the earth the way you can a baseball they'd fall off and be gone before you'd got past the first winding. See that the rain doesn't seem to start or end anywhere, just comes out of the air and drops. Notice that you breathe in and out and that the light in the sky changes all the time in waves.

Watch the sky curve all the way around to the edge of your eyes, then keep going behind your head to make a circle. If you can feel the earth under your feet, know that never in your life have you not been touching something, wearing it down a little, being worn down a little. If you can stop, and let yourself look, let your eyes do what they do best, stop . . . and let yourself see and see that everything is doing things to you as you do things to everything. Then you know that although it's only a little planet it is hugely beautiful, and surely the finest place in the world to be. So watch it, look at it, see what it's like to walk around on it.

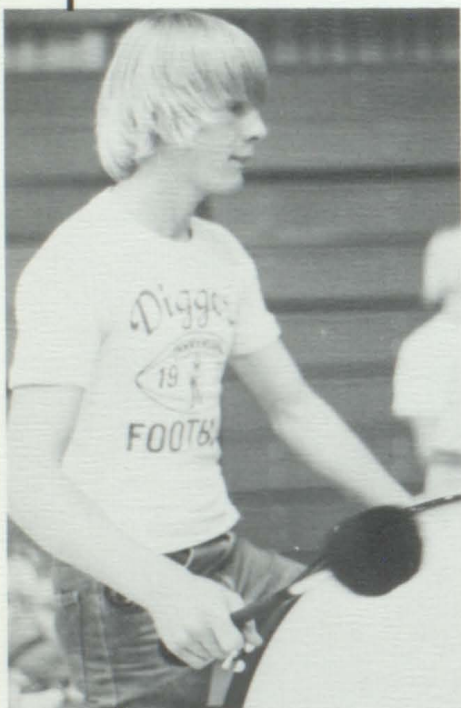

If we let it the earth can be born again and again, facing the sun like flowers that open to the dawn and close at night. If we could see it all together on black space, nine planets, a sun, a bubble earth with sweet air, water, rock, grass, lightning and ice and branches with strange shapes to them, beaches where you dig and build, not caring that the tide will fill and wash away. There's nothing here that isn't alive, from the deadest fallen branch to the water like running ice, everything seems so much apart of everything else, nothing can be seperated or thought of as dead.

It's small but it's beautiful, it's small but it's fine like a rainbow . . .

like a bubble.
